Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: .German forces, General Nivelle began his ambitious offensive (April 16, 1917). The first move was a sudden attack between Soissons and Rheims. The initial French success was spectacular, as seventeen thousand prisoners and seventy-five guns were taken in three days. But persevering in the struggle did not win anything of importance; when the balance of 1 On the other hand, the strengthening of the enemy s forces opposite my front necessarily brought about for the time being the characteristics of a wearing-out battle. Sir Douglas Haig s Despatches. Second Battle of the Aisne. gains and losses was struck, the French losses were found so heavy 1 in proportion to the gains that there was a great reaction in France. The battle had been a. test of the plan of General Nivelle, and he had only been able to make a poor showing for his theories. So evident was this that there was a crisis in France, which brought about a consultation of the French ministers. On May 15 General Nivelle was relieved, and the command of the French armies in the field was given to General Petain, the well-tried defender of Verdun. At the same time General Foch was made Chief of the French General Staff. In these battles the Allies had experienced the strength of the new German defense developed by the Hindenburg-Ludendorf f Command after the lessons of the Battle of the Somme. The construction of positions in the West was systematically revised, from...
