Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: . raised his eyes, and pressing my hand he softly cried out: Above our heads The sky with the eternal stars. Above the stars their Maker. A thrill of awe ran through me; I felt cold all over, and sank on his shoulder. My heart was full. Where are those raptures? Alas! where youth is. In Petersburg I met Yakov again eight years after. I had only just been appointed to a position in the service, and some one had got him a little post in some department. Our meeting was most joyful. I shall never forget the moment when, sitting alone one day at home, I suddenly heard his voice in the passage. How I started; with what throbbing at the heart I leaped up and flung myself on his neck, without giving him time to take off his fur overcoat and unfasten his scarf! How greedily I gazed at him through bright, involuntary tears of tenderness! He had grown a little older during those seven years; lines, delicate as if they had been traced by a needle, furrowed his brow here and there, his cheeks were a little more hollow, and his hair was thinner; but he had hardly more beard, and his smile was just the same as ever; and his laugh, a soft, inward, as it were breathless laugh, was the same too. Mercy on us! what didn't we talk about that day! The favourite poems we read to one another!...
